Climate Smart Agriculture in South Asia: Fostering regional cooperation for sustainable and resilient agricultural adaptation

Dhaka, Bangladesh, 8 December 2022: Partners at the SAARC Agriculture Centre launched a project website for Consortium for Scaling-up Climate Smart Agriculture in South Asia (C-SUCSeS) on 8 December 2022.

C-SUCSeS, is being implemented in partnership with International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD), SAARC Agriculture Centre (SAC) and SAARC Development Fund (SDF). The central objective is to develop evidence-based strategies to collectively tackle the impact of climate change and promote sustainable and resilient agriculture intensification in South Asia.

South Asia is one of the world's most vulnerable regions in terms of climate change impacts. The region is still predominantly an agrarian society, with much of the population dependent on agriculture for their livelihoods, but the sector is at high risk from climate change. According to one estimate, the region could lose between 10-50 percent of crop production by end of the century due to global warming. This reality calls for integrating climate change adaptation and mitigation strategies with overarching goal of ensuring food, nutrition, and livelihood security for millions of underprivileged and marginalized people living in the region. The partnership focuses on promoting sustainable and resilient agricultural intensification in South Asia through building the capacity of institutions and enhancing skills, to scale-up climate smart strategies and technologies.
